
□ BILLI-MEAON THE STREET KITTEN WHO BECAME MY PET

My Rescue & Caring Journey in Barh, Bihar

A small rescue. A lasting bond.

“She came into my life as a frightened street kitten.
Today, she comes through my window as if she owns the place.”

A personal rescue story by Satyabrata Das

The Rescue Begins

In Barh, Bihar, during one of my daily street-animal feeding rounds, I came across something that I could not simply walk away from.

I was inside the playground of ANS College when I heard the faint cries of kittens coming from a pile of debris made up of old channels that had been kept along one side of the field. It was already very dark, and despite trying, I could not locate them.

I had no choice but to return, but I went back with a heavy heart, feeling helpless that I had heard their cries but could not reach them.

The next morning, I came to know that a family had relocated the kittens from their rooftop to the ANS College field the previous night.

I immediately called Aryan, told him everything, and requested his help with the rescue.

He told me that finding the kittens would require more people because the debris of channels would have to be shifted carefully, one by one. He called some local boys under the age of 18 along with a few of their friends. Everyone came to the spot, and together we started moving the channels and searching for the kittens.

Finally, after carefully shifting the debris, we found them!

I was extremely thankful to Aryan, his team, and all the boys who came forward to help. To appreciate their support, Aryan arranged cold drinks and samosas and distributed them among everyone who had participated in the rescue.

The Mother Cat

I brought all three kittens to my rest room so that they would be safe.

That night, their mother started making sounds and searching for them. I understood that she was looking for her babies.

So I placed the kittens on the ground floor and hid myself nearby.

After some time, I saw their mother come to them and feed them milk.

I was incredibly happy.

Then I watched her take one of the kittens away with her.

I returned to my room and went to sleep, thinking that she would gradually come back and take the remaining kittens as well.

But at dawn, when I woke up and searched for the kittens, I found two of them sleeping beside my room.

I brought them back inside.

For the next few days, I continued trying the same process, hoping that their mother would return and take both of them with her. But even after three days, it did not happen.

Finally, I stopped trying to reunite them with their mother in that way. I decided that I would take responsibility for them.

From Street Food to a Home

I started feeding them milk, boiled eggs, and sometimes small fish. They ate happily.

Later, I bought packaged cat food such as Purepet, Whiskas, and other foods for them.

They gradually became comfortable with me and with their new surroundings.

But after a few months, one of the kittens became sick and stopped eating.

I took him to the Barh Sub-Divisional Veterinary Hospital and consulted the doctor. Unfortunately, despite the treatment and my efforts, he passed away after three days.

His death was heartbreaking.

Only one female kitten remained with me.

I gave her a name:

“BILLI-MEAON”

She was no longer just a street kitten.

She had become my pet, my responsibility, and a part of my life.

A Free Spirit With a Home

Billi-Meaon is still with me, living a beautiful life.

Over time, she gradually became socialized with the surroundings. Most of the time, she enjoys being outside, exploring her own little world, but she always comes back to me when she wants food or when the weather becomes difficult.

She has friends too.

I have always kept my window open so that she can enter freely whenever she wants food or shelter.

And there is something that still makes me smile.

Many times, when I was away from my room, Billi-Meaon brought some of her cat friends inside through the open window.

Perhaps she had learned that my room was not only her safe place—it was a safe place for her friends too.

The Reality Around Us

But Billi-Meaon's story also made me understand something much bigger about the lives of street animals.

In my colony, very few people genuinely have compassion for animals and birds. Unfortunately, many people treat animals differently and sometimes use them for religious or superstitious practices, believing that doing so can reduce the negative effects of Graha Dosha.

I have witnessed situations that are extremely painful to see.

If a male calf defecates somewhere on the road, people beat him.

If someone feeds a male calf sitting near a particular location, people may become angry and even beat the animal brutally, warning the person not to feed him there again.

Many times, people have been ready to fight with me because I was feeding animals.

But I always try to remain calm.

I think to myself:

“If I argue with them, they may take out their anger on the voiceless animal.”

So I choose to remain silent rather than allow an innocent animal to suffer because of an argument.

☐☐ A Bigger Question

And sadly, I don't think this is limited to my colony or even to Barh.

In many places across India, street animals continue to face hunger, cruelty, neglect, and misunderstanding.

They cannot speak for themselves.

They cannot explain their pain.

They cannot ask for justice.

All they can do is look at us with innocent eyes and trust that someone will care.

That is why I believe there should be a strict and effective government mechanism within our legal and judicial system to protect voiceless animals and birds and to take meaningful action against cruelty.

Because compassion should not depend on where an animal happens to be born.

And sometimes, one small rescue can change an animal's entire life.

For me, that rescue was Billi-Meaon.

She came into my life as a frightened street kitten.

Today, she comes through my window as if she
owns the place.

And perhaps, in a way—
she does. ☐♥

BILLI-MEAON

The Street Kitten Who Became My Pet

My Rescue & Caring Journey in Barh, Bihar

"Sometimes, a small rescue can change an animal's entire life."

The First Encounter

In Barh, Bihar, during one of my daily street-animal feeding rounds, I heard faint cries of kittens coming from a pile of debris made up of old channels kept along one side of the field of ANS College. It was already very dark, and despite trying, I could not locate them.

I had no choice but to return, but I went back with a heavy heart, feeling helpless that I had heard their cries but could not reach them.

The Mother Cat

I brought the three kittens to my rest room so they would be safe. That night, their mother came searching for them. I placed the kittens on the ground floor and hid nearby. After some time, I saw her come and feed them milk. Then she took one of the kittens away with her.

The next morning, I found two kittens sleeping beside my room. I brought them back inside. For three days I tried to reunite them with their mother, but she did not return. Finally, I decided to take responsibility for them.

Some bonds are written in the heart, not by blood.

The first sighting at night

The mother with her babies

She took one kitten with her...

The Rescue

The next morning, I learned that a family had relocated the kittens from their rooftop to the ANS College field the previous night. I immediately called Aryan, told him everything, and requested his help.

He gathered a team of local boys under 18 and a few of their friends. Together we carefully shifted the channels and searched for the kittens. Finally, we found them!

I was extremely thankful to Aryan, his team, and all the boys who came forward to help. To appreciate their support, Aryan arranged cold drinks and samosas and distributed them among everyone.

From Street Food to a Home

- I started feeding them milk, boiled eggs, and sometimes small fish. They ate happily.
- Later, I bought packaged cat food such as Purepet, Whiskas, and other foods for them.
- They gradually became comfortable with me and their new surroundings.
- But after a few months, one kitten became sick and stopped eating. I took him to the Barh Sub-Divisional Veterinary Hospital. Despite treatment and my efforts, he passed away after three days.

Only one female kitten remained with me. I gave her a name —

BILLI-MEAON

She was no longer just a street kitten. She had become my pet, my responsibility, and a part of my life.

A Free Spirit With a Home

Billi-Meaon is still with me, living a beautiful life. She enjoys being outside, exploring her world, but always comes back when she wants food or when the weather is difficult. She has friends too.

I keep my window open so she can enter freely. Many times, when I was away, she brought some of her cat friends inside through the window.

Perhaps she had learned that my room was not only her safe place — it was a safe place for her friends too.

Billi-Meaon at home

A little explorer... always coming back

A Home is not a place it's a feeling

The Reality Around Us

In my colony, very few people have true compassion for animals and birds. Many treat them differently or use them for religious or superstitious practices, believing it can reduce the effects of Graha Dosha.

I have seen people beat male calves, get angry if someone feeds them, and even threaten me for feeding animals. I choose to remain silent, because if I argue, they may take out their anger on the voiceless animal.

A Bigger Question

In many places across India, street animals face hunger, cruelty, neglect, and misunderstanding. They cannot speak for themselves. They look at us with innocent eyes and trust that someone will care.

That is why there should be a strict and effective government mechanism to protect voiceless animals and birds and to take meaningful action against cruelty.

Because compassion should not depend on where an animal happens to be born.

For me, that rescue was Billi-Meaon.

She came into my life as a frightened street kitten. Today, she comes through my window as if she owns the place. And perhaps, in a way — she does.

